Not illustrated. 1872 Excerpt: ... being adherent to each other thus become the cuticle of the hair, as is recognized on the clear border surrounding it and on the finely serrated edge. These cuticular cells, which enter the root of the hair, divide it into a central portion surrounding the papilla, and a peripheral, which lies next the vitreous membrane, and forms at the most the fourth part of the former. The central portion of the root of the hair, as stated, is composed of cylindrical cells resting upon the papilla, and of polyhedral cells further removed from these. They are marked by their large round nuclei deeply stained by carmine, and by a scanty homogeneous protoplasmic substance. Higher up above the papilla the protoplasm increases in quantity; the cells, as also their nuclei, become at first oval, and those more external become spindle-shaped with lengthened nuclei. In this portion, which generally exceeds the length of the papilla, the hair-root gradually diminishes in size, and is still surrounded by the obliquely disposed cuticular cells. Its component cells are still capable of being colored by carmine. At a rather sharply defined margin the contour of the individual cells disappears, and fine lines alone are seen, which appear to be the outlines of fibres; the nuclei are also drawn out into threads. The whole mass is no longer stained by carmine, and in gray hairs, from which this description is taken, we have the hard, silvery, horn-like, cortical substance of the hairshaft. Thus the central portion of the root, enclosed by the cuticular cells, passes over into the hair substance, the so-called hair cells becoming more fusiform, and finally being transformed into small horny spindles. The peripheral portion, between the cuticular cells and the vitreous membrane o...
