Not illustrated. 1921 Excerpt: ...We will endeavor to make a detailed study of the structure of the intestinal villi. It proves quite difficult to obtain really good specimens of the same, since the action of many fixing agents will cause the body of the villus to become detached from its epithelial covering. This is especially true of our simple formalin fixation. The best results are obtained from osmic acid combined with sublimate. Of the various combinations we will select the sublimate-chromic-osmic-acetic acid (p. 31). The specimen must be fixed immediately after death; therefore we should use the intestine of the cat, dog or monkey. A piece of the jejunum is mounted on a wax plate in the aforementioned manner and placed in the above-named fluid for six to eight hours; thereafter it is washed in running water overnight and dehydrated in the usual manner. While in the 95% alcohol small square pieces are cut out with the razor, transferred to absolute alcohol, and after the use of chloroform are embedded in paraffin. Transverse sections through the villus are most demonstrative, but may be supplemented by longitudinal cuts. The sections are stained in Biondi solution (p. 67). Structure of the Intestinal Villi. Fig. 125 shows a section approximately through the centre of the villus. Externally the villus is invested with high cylindrical epithelium. Between the cylindrical cells numerous goblet cells (bz) are found. The structure of the epithelium has been exhaustively discussed under the topic of cylindrical cells (p. II, 35); we therefore refer the reader to that section. We again see migrating cells (ivz) piercing the epithelium on two places. The epithelium is mounted on the body of the villus, which latter is nothing more than an elevation of the intestinal mucosa. Externally it is...
