Not illustrated. 1873 Excerpt: ...make us suspect hemorrhage in the right hemisphere. Such equilateral contractions of the field often remain behind in persons who have been affected with an apoplectic fit. Loss of the right side of the field is more irksome than that of the left, more especially in reading, as the patient cannot read so easily and rapidly on account of his not being able to foresee the words (Graefe). In slight degrees of cerebral hemorrhage, the sight is often quite unaffected. Hemipia may, however, be also produced by temporary affections of the nerve trunk, e. g, syphilis. Senile softening of the brain is not, as a rule, accompanied by amaurosis, but, of course, the atrophic changes in the brain may extend to the optic nerves, the nutrition of the latter becoming impaired on account perhaps of the disease of the vessels. Epilepsy may produce amaurosis when it is due to some disease of the brain, for instance, meningitis, for epilepsy must be looked upon as a symptom and not as a disease. In diseases of the spinal cord, more especially chronic myelitis and locomotor ataxy, amaurosis, from progressive atrophy of the optic nerves, is not unfrequently met with. But it hardly ever makes its appearance in locomotor ataxy until a late period of the disease Kl. Monatsbl., 1803, p. 259. of the spine, long after the impairment of the mobility and sensibility of the lower limbs, and the paralytic affections of the muscles of the eye, the latter often being amongst the first symptoms of the spinal disease. In some very rare instances, the atrophy of the optic nerves has preceded by a long period (several years) the first symptoms of spinal disease (Graefe). This late occurrence of amaurosis is explained by the fact that the degeneration ascends from the vertebral canal...
